

THE BELOIT POETRY JOURNAL

Volume 26 - Numbers 3-4

Spring-Summer 1976

CONTENTS

- | | | |
|----|-------------------|--|
| 1 | ANTHONY A. WEST | Exploration Without Tenure |
| 2 | RICHARD JACKSON | Garrettsville, A Trespass Vision |
| 6 | TIMOTHY COHRS | My Choice, My Response | | 9 | TAYLOR GRAHAM | Winter Salvage |
| 11 | SUZANNE GROSS | Two Poems |
| 18 | TOM MOORE | Melakwa Huckleberries |
| 20 | JERALD BULLIS | Two Poems |
| 28 | MARK MURDAUGH | The Death of Archimedes |
| 29 | A. G. SOBIN | From Utah: Apocalyptic Letter to My Friends |
| 32 | JOHN WHEATCROFT | Night Howl |
| 38 | DEBORAH BURNHAM | Picnic |
| 39 | F. RICHARD THOMAS | Friends |
| 41 | EDWARD MCCRORIE | Odysseus and His Sirens |
| 47 | HARRISON FISHER | The Exo-Jonah Tent | | 48 | KAREN SNOW | Two Poems |
| 59 | PAUL CORRIGAN | Two Poems |
| 61 | HARRY STESSEL | Tell It to the River |
| 62 | T. ALAN BROUGHTON | The Kill |
| 67 | STEVE FAY | Three Poems |
| 69 | RICHARD H. NESTER | Two Poems |
| 72 | ROBERT GIBB | The Kutztown Halloween Parade |
| 74 | MICHAEL NORTH | Four Poems |
| 79 | JOHN C. WITTE | Two Poems |

THE BELOIT POETRY JOURNAL

Volume 26 - Numbers 3-4

Spring-Summer 1976

EXPLORATION WITHOUT TENURE

They could never explain to outsiders that summer in the Galápagos.

Days they spent stewing cacti over small fires & pushing boulders of quartz into the sea; at night, the awkward groaning of the tortoises illuminated their dreams.

They scanned the skies for helicopters, rainclouds, portents, alike in vain,

& argued over the taste of salt, the meaning of Beckett, horses versus dogs, whether it was better to breathe in or out, which should die first.

By the time Darwin discovered them they had pitched separate tents on islands divided by seas of shattered crystal.

They had become two remarkably distinct species.

Anthony A. West

GARRETTSVILLE, A TRESPASS VISION: ANNOTATIONS TO A LIFE OF HART CRANE

*...slid on that backward vision The mind is churned to spittle, whispering bell.
 —from "Voyages"*

1. morning

These mornings the wind sharpens itself on the eaves, sparrows shake rumors of snow from their wings.
 Inside, there's not much left—the cold congeals on a pane, a shaft of light from a lamp impales this yellow mattress.
 At times the room seems to dissolve beneath your vagrant touch—Still, there are things that hold you here as a winter wasp alive behind the blinds—The shoes of another month drop like those of a late lover and there are hopes, fears, etc.

You watch as the early hawk rises, tucking a shadow beneath its wings.

Here, where the wind deposits the first cries of crow and coot, there are no roads but the dark—These things you have: a withered hand, dim eyes,
a tongue that cannot tell.

You think: next spring in that stream beyond the house the salmon will begin to change—mouth starting to hook, skin turning cankerous, falling off as they spawn to death.

Now, nested in these depths, what dreams hatch? what loves squat like bloated toads?

Beyond, a small darkness stirs in the attic of a tree, The doors of the wind edge open.
You remember the boy you saw once—syphilitic, selling violets—his eyes—like crutches hurtled against glass, falling mute and sudden.

Now, this man on the bed beside you limps awkwardly through sleep.
You watch as the sky reddens, its light hardly legible beginning to change the names for shadows—sycamore, cedar, tamarack.

No hiding places are left in the empty spaces of those words.

2. evening

The leaves flaked with rust, milkweed drying, beginning to curl, you poke through the wreckage of last light.
The dim moon lurks in a ravine.

Overhead, an osprey scours the vague stars, its frayed wings filling with shadow.

You remember the bits of fur you found once in a sprung trap, imagine the mink, the torn shadow he drags behind like a paw.

He shifts carefully now—his barbed eyes cut through darkness, poke through the scraps of this dream.

And so, you return again to this vacant shell of a cabin waiting for the first drift of star.
Where for months swallows began their nests bits of distant fields

cling to the eaves like wax droppings.
Here you remember the arthritic songs of crickets, the rush of rabbits through the mesh wire of the underbrush.
You lean back now, the flesh tightening on your bones.
At the edge of swamp, the damp tunnels of muskrats begin to contract.

Somewhere, beyond these ridges, late deer click through snow stubble fields, searching for roots.
Quietly, as they pass, they brush up small clots of sod, blackening the snow.
You enter those spaces now, entering the broken spaces of these words.
If only they might hold you to this dark.
Here, the air is scratched by paths of migrating geese—the sky is pink as a lung and against it, the branches of a tree have spread wide as bronchia, emptying a voice, our own.

Richard Jackson

MY CHOICE, MY RESPONSE

on all fours
where beach sand turns jagged pebbles, abandoned shells, I could be described in right angles:
arms / trunk, thighs / shins, calves / feet, a series of orthogonal paths leading from fingers to toe nails, and, how neat, even the beach spreads perpendicular—if you overlook its slope, and the sweep of chest and slumped back, how the head rounds like fungal clusters, and suddenly there are no right angles and I'm staring into the withered ovoid of a dead lake smelt.

1.
the eyes, everywhere under foot—to pick a step almost impossible in this annual mosaic of smelt strewn sand.

the eyes, black precisely round and somehow unwilling to join their silver bodies in deflation and rot:

lying twisted, poured out from a rush of Spring rain percolated through the vineyards and valleys and general slope this lake spreads up to for states, and further still: into clouds heavy with the water three greater lakes sweat, or the gulf flings northward, and that cold Canada condenses, with all of these stirred by the planet's subtle tilt;

but following a week-gone current's trail by the dead smelt grouped in three's and five's up a rising beach ridge, I find the whole force abuts the rock wall of a terraced lawn and ends.

2.

sometimes I know you right, Corbu, culture is an orthogonal state of mind, does just like a stylized knuckle's sharpness, and the arm's full force behind it, or say a semi, backing in, the long smudged solid blocking all street light as it rocks through the gate on twelve wheels groaning at their brakes, its metal revved, smoking, echoed until every dock eye waits: waits for it to slam the rubber molding of the concrete bay, waits for the sputter waits for the last forced hiss of engine and brake, waits—too long,

they are all about something else, even my fellows, those paid to watch for trucks, slide off in tangents
missing the grace, the easy tension this latest trailer swaggers in.

3.

the eyes, the eyes
their hard blackness turned smoke
in the neighbor's fire, become a bad smell with driftwood and lake weed, that I wanted to tell her how important debris, beached carp rotted to their yellow skeletons, or the dimples a clam will bubble up (as the day, at water's edge, a spent shell sent me due west looking for just such a mark: skirting wave ends and a curious type of humped vine designed to catch a foot at its laces, I strolled unsuccessful as a novice, which I was, until I jumped up a wet rock and for the first time that hour lifted my eyes from moist sand: the entire beach suddenly bowed to the right, curved inland and glaring bright as the waves, right before me, right where I had no expectations, where I stood,

breathing,
alive.

Timothy Cohrs

WINTER SALVAGE

What I dreamed was mushrooms—all the beauties so foreign I don't know their names nor who's a poison, who a prince.

They grow beyond the bare ground junked cars, chairs springing out of their upholstery like weeds;

beyond the woods cleared for the next block of neighbors at our back (star-moss still intricate in out-of-the-way holes; the last fireweed disheveled on the lot lines); beyond the felled spruce gamey with sap as a battlefield burning off its dead.

I dreamed the mushrooms to names: bullfrogs warted and wide as my hand, the old brown men slouched under their caps, the white buttons, crimson dangerous roses, dusky ruffles and blunt spears;

dreamed the whole
dwarf forest, how the first snow of November would pack it under, deep and safe
as a forest under a dream.

Taylor Graham

TWO POEMS

Tim Broderick of Youghal

There's danger to research.
He came at me like lightning out of a book in a cellar, and I looking for somebody else: a respectable uncle in ice-cream—and here's Tim Broderick come over me like a fit with his damn pack and whistle, making me cry on my notes; making me put the shoes off my feet and feel the world
warm beneath me to the throat and myself to the roots at my eyes.

I don't know more about Tim than myself: it's what I am getting but old lets me guess how he'd be. We don't know all that's going on down in the genes surely: there's some excuse for me to be making up poetry, but none at all for being crazy as I am.

We've all of us read about heroes and kings seeing swords in the sky: it's not many are mad enough now to be saying they've seen them.
He'd be like the Arab horse, that brightens whatever he crosses.

There's how my great gael was coming with me from Youghal of Corcaigh where the vikings sat down, where His Honor the Mayor Walter Raleigh failed with his spuds while the Spanish God help them heaved over the bay, and men of Youghal are at fishing still.
He'd be a hundred and forty-nine years old when I met him, and I've seen his grave, but it's never him buried in it, he's walking into me too strong.

For he was a walking man, too poor to be having a horse and wasn't at work for C. M. & St. Paul with the most of the Micks there at home; maybe he hadn't a tongue to the English, nor heart for it neither.

Ten years he walked to his death from Janesville to Beloit and back through Rock River's kind valley hilled and green, shaggy from trees, and he sleeping wherever the starry dark came down the road to meet him: a small man, with a skin like an apple's inside and the wing of a raven to his hair, all the western ocean in his eyes, bearing me among the trifles on his back.

Nor his songs nor his whistle nor pack came down to any of us, but I've got his trade, peddling sundries fancy or needful; and his need to ease the way with liting on my own.
At that, he taught us all to play.
Wasn't it his son-in-law Harry my granddad that was, nearly killed himself trying to drink at the Irish God love him.

Out of the holy hunch on him I get a stake in the pain, and fierce relish of defeat;
 a place behind Ferdiad at the ford, and sense to see him kissing the man would be killing him's Irish; rooted faith that words make be, living powers of the elder world blessed by Jesus and Mary His Mother, Saint Brendan and the Pope; a knot in the soul
 I can't get by for Culann's hound tying himself to the stone so he'd die on his feet and the grey horse at his breast of blood; how any morning of the world a man may be walking out to die about it; the hearing their horns yell over the hills I'll not see.

Or what am I doing at him with my bones and my breath, stodge of a Kraut that I am, half bloody English what's more.
 How am I riding his loins and my name as it is when there's kings in his own.

Whatever, he's there,- like a dolmen astride of my heart.

An Leannán-Síodhe

I'll take shapes at you, wise young girls, old girls to turn your head, heroes on crutches and smiling grave boys, hare in the hazel, hind over your road, round-legged proud-necked small-hooved red-eared horse blowing my name down your back.

You'll not fear bad fame, the names they'll put on you, two for death and two for sorrow, borrowing dread each from another, brother at back and beck to needle you, wheelde you over their hags' path:
wrath is all they'll be for you, and rack.
Black blood clot in their mouth, droughth to their big fancy loins.
It's not any one of them I would ask for their life or send my own.

I'll lay my tongue to you the way you won't bear it.
I'll put my tongue between your teeth that you'll feel yourself scream and they hearing the tune you don't know reeling out of your mouth.
Deer's cry, hound's cry, hunting over and out of your heart I'll gnaw to the ends of your fingers, I'll carve it in the lintel of your lips.
I'll drink the blood back of your eyes out of your skull and you living.

I'll mint your pain, and they spending the money of your mind for kind red cows and wheat on the hill, still rain falling all the night, white ships leaning long down the waves, navies of the clouds and the holies on board, lordly beards blowing over the wind.

I'll foot you like an owl.
I'll twist it into you, I'll twist it out of you, I'll be at you whatever.
With the comb of my hands and the comb of my teeth I'll comb you out the way you'll curl.
I'll be at your mouth and the backs of your knees, at the valves of your ears and the roots growing under your tongue, I'll be into the nooks of your teeth and the twelve hinges to your ribs, I'll walk at the heels of your hands.
I'll have my horses of your two round sides and I driving them days and riding them nights till the sweat of them shines like the sea with the white bird of the moon standing still in it.
I'll be the first and last friend of your two friendly thighs and your slow, horse-helping hands.
I've made friends with your mouth the way I'll be at you whatever among them of hell or them of heaven.

I'll coin your tears, and they spending the hoard of your heart to buy wry tunes twining into them then, when one at last with looking lips slips between their aching legs and arms, charms to break a spell that walks, stalking a father over his grave, brave days in hell with god king and harper, a sharper sword and bruter bones.

I'll lie along your side, I'll breathe in your breath the way you'll be breathing in mine, I hearing you cry in your sleep and call the silkie to come to you out of the sea, that's myself only looking for you over the backs and manes of the waves, and you not knowing it ever.

I'll put eyes in your heart that you'll look into stone, see the hearts beating in trees, trees of blood in the antlers of deer, deer in the dark rising like stars, stars behind the morning sun, the sun's white horses pace the sky.

Me only you'll not see, though you're looking me long in the eyes of horse, hind or hare, hero that's wading the fords of your blood or girl at the bone of your breast.

You'll have yourself,
no more than I give you,
and peace be away from you surely.
I've seen you, a cuisle mo croidhe, going on down your own road alone, I riding your head like a crow, ten claws in your wolfhound hair.

Suzanne Gross

MELAKWA HUCKLEBERRIES

Back bowed with sunlight both her hands working She nurses and heals into pails the tart berries While hikers in red their Sierra cups rattling slowly pass by.

Her fingers grow blue with the stains of the Salish; Ripe fruit of the rich tribe shamed in the Potlatch.

Deep in the bushes
she stalks the dark berries; Squaw aching and bleeding the dust from the trail.

The tip of one finger's so colored she plucks it; Face purple with streaks where her hand's smeared the sweat off.

Far back, ever searching in bushes head-high She watches the red lines move ghostly by.

Weary, she rests on a moss-rotted nurse-log; Rich juices alive in her ringing-full pail.

Tsimshian Coppers dance to the fires.
Spirits of Salmon bless the bird-blankets.
Bees sleep in her hair as the hikers pass by.

Tom Moore

TWO POEMS

Curriculum Vitae

- 1 Nature poetry: don't tell me about it, you'll make me think you think there's something else—Man poetry, Woman poetry in the failure of our divisions: tell me about the pettifogging flipsysquiddlums lawyers have abstracted from the goings-on of partridge & periwinkle, imitative, egregious with the wealth of their evolvment

& I'll smile in more than mild accord: tell me about the gathering of committee members from their separate flights like the congregating of waxwings to shore berries in June, & I'll be happy that we share a knowledge of where we are:

- 2 we've been building ourselves up for so long that a come-down might not be debilitating.—I want to tell you about where I'm from: Henry Rowe Schoolcraft got uplifted in 1818-19, according to his journal, by the "barren magnificence" of the Ozarks:

what he found there hadn't yet been worked into what we have to offer: feuding hillbillies! clandestine stills! ragtoed barefooters!
(black & white) potatoes planted in the dark of the moon!
—cliches keep the land backward: leering outhouses embellished with lean crescent moons! stump jumpers who would give their eyeteeth,

- 3 if they had'em, to cornhole a city-slicker! women so wild the buck wolves back off & the he-goats limp on the hogbacks stoical-eyed with success! warts so bad only a black she-wizard can cure!

I come from the only extensive elevated area between the Appalachians & the Rockies: I read it is a fair land that has kept

its essential wildness through three centuries of moneylusting rapscallionism: I don't mind being identified with something that withholding: there are not so many places left you can go to to fish & hunt & come back from refreshed—

4 the first streams I walked beside were the cold hollow waters of hill country—I'd never seen real mountains then and so could be joyous with the heights I could get to the top of: if you find what I'm saying plain it might have something to do with where I come from—one person who has apparently been there calls it "generally an undistinguished forest of oak, maple, hickory and pine"; but "on the other hand," he says "no plain hills ought to be so steep, so shot through with remarkable caves, so flush with even more remarkable crystal springs, some of them boiling 5 out hundreds of millions of gallons of pure cold water every day"— such clarity, overweeningness & constancy

I'm pleased to be a part of even when I'm not there, every day—for I remember the rocky thin-soil glades Rusty wandered in the wandering times of his need and came back from with something un-yardlike in the amber of his eyes, and sometimes I grow bluff with the north-facing bluffs spring-seepage cools the fern falls of something of what I've grown with makes it easier to turn away from the shallow insistences of occupation to hollows shadowy with their bedrock-carving waters—

6 the region was uplifted (I'm here to tell you) but never subjected to the violent, distorting upheavals more pinnacly-mountainous places were infrabuckled by: Ozark raisures are the remains of once continuous layers of sediment the dissection of rivers & creeks has shaped to mountains roughly democratic in their heights—the hills I hunted squirrels on were laid down as sea-bottom during the Paleozoic era—they darkened into light when the seas withdrew: I wandered the heights of the sea's depth before I ever saw the North Atlantic (my first ocean)—

7 sandstone & limestone laid down in layers, long & slow: horizontal rock: that's my heritage—so if you get an orogeny out of this be surprised.—In the Ozarks you never forget that the earth is made of rock

bare bones, plainness itself, tough & permanent-looking is there to bother the onlookingness of those who prefer to place eternity elsewhere; but then one ought to remember that every rock's parentage is fluidity—no matter how you get laid down (or otherwise intruded) as if to stay, your ancestry is irremediably flow: so

Let The Earth Be Earthy

- 1 As when a bald eagle cuts loose with a tail wind off the hill down over the lake, its wings strung-out level so you know it isn't a buzzard or an osprey, as you watch from your desk window with a view of the lake, and just as it pleaches song from the birds in the suburb-reaches of the cove point arush

tall-pine high over the water where lilies, sunk brush, & pikeweed make fine coverts for fish, it drops its landing gear like a heron alighting, gawking its legs down & out as if they were long enough to stalk a frog,

- 2 fans its tail white-spraddling sunlight-impearlant brakewise, back-pedals with its wings & tries to stoop fast but actually loses altitude like a maple seed, in a kind of conic-comic amblesome descent, which terminates in a talon washing but not a fish: so my head & tail are free, white, & I often mish.— I don't want to want sense: if I can't sing I yet would like to talk poetry to you, for I've given up on song in favor of a rougher similitude in dissimilitude—

- 3 these ragged stanzas are the hazardry I interpose for metre, & I am not too careful about whether they are svelte versos or not—as the wise say in the country if you want something kinky go to church: poetry's constant subject is immortality—its highest rage screams against the ruinage of days—poetry calls what is forever done for in its passing into the luminescence of a staying: it introduces the what not that will never come again to the divine strumpet that is ever coming: so nature's our mother, & we shall not want

- 4 for clay

for stone to obtrude our want in the wilderness ever lasting: I do not know better than to be intervenient to the motions that move me as well, as well as they move the periwinkle & the bushmaster—I am a pupil, often in awe of the peccadillos of the master—I accept the lesson as it is given, giving my acceptance to the melt's roil in the mountain passes where the ravine-hung nests of early nesting birds are swamped amuck by the released ravin of the unknown—let the earth be earthy

- 5 yet sometimes come divine: let the primrose be simply a yellow primrose

I have no analytic rock garden to admire it in; I would hang my sayings in their manyness from the scrannelly manifold antlers of the red willow and stand there a while in the willow patch the spring floods redden, admirant of all my emulative botched spangling: the snows have seeped & risen away

& April's soggy & brown in this region—the weather's changing, but nothing more apocalyptic than the return of the geese is passing over hereabouts.

THE DEATH OF ARCHIMEDES

Archimedes drew his tangents in the gravel of Syracuse.
The Roman dragoon, unsure stupid as a clot of blood appeared.

The intersects complete despite the wind.
The furrows ran, the field, of thought,
deeper than the ploughshare.

The trooper
could put a rook in play.
The legions' ranks,
his lineage,
the port of call and point of home, the logic of the Appian—these lines, these constructs between two points he understands.

Archimedes plucks with his walking stick Betelgeuse
and stretches it through the center of the earth to the nave of procyon.
The Roman, with his own walking stick, touches Archimedes to the core.

Mark Murdaugh

FROM UTAH APOCALYPTIC LETTER TO MY FRIENDS

I have spent the morning helping Charlie Potts fix his accelerator cable. For two full days everyone's been waiting for the giant winter storm that's supposed to hit town and I was supposed to get to Charlie's early to avoid the rain-mixed-with-snow but was late due to the plumbing which backed up all over the kitchen floor.

Sharon was up all night reading and has been napping since four this afternoon. The Mormon Church just ended its big conference and made a final plea for the faithful to store enough food to last seven years because all the signs are saying that the Day of (You Know) is almost upon us. The prediction was for frozen rain tonight changing to snow beneath the 3,000 foot level. That's 1,600 feet below the streets of this city and I'm seriously wondering if the Mormons could possibly have buried their food that low.

Egypt and Syria are trying to beat the invincible Jews again, and may win, and by now, the second morning of war, hundreds are dead from mortar rounds dripping straight down into their bunkers on the Golan Heights overlooking the Sinai Desert.

And tonight, here in this back room in Salt Lake City, Utah, I am trying to decide whether to exercise my true powers and trade them all to buy Pablo Picasso one more year and I'm wondering if the cable I patched could possibly last Charlie all the way across the Nevada desert night before making its fatal bone chilling snap.

There's no humidity at all in the Wasatch Heights overlooking the Great Salt Desert. I had to take a second shower today to get the car grease out of my hair and it's dried me out badly. Sharon set up a vaporizer in my room just before her nap. Droopy-eyed and nude, her breasts miscolored purple by the florescent light of the bathroom, she slipped Johnson's Baby Oil over my back and shoulders and for no reason I felt sure I'd never see her again.

The sun's been missing all week and the mid-evening light that's now outside is very white because it's tinged slightly with blue. In it I am reading from the Collected Poems of Frank O'Hara standing up close against the door-sized window and in that light I can't get over how beautiful the black type looks on the exceedingly white page. But black clouds have really begun to move in now and to finish I have to move under the tungsten ceiling light where the paper turns the ugly color of yellowing newsprint.

But in consolation the vaporizer's working extra right. Humidity is building fast and droplets of water have appeared on the cold glass; beads of sweat pop up from each pore in my bare oily back which doesn't itch for the first time in two months. With the side of my hot face pressed really hard against the wet, freezing glass, I think I can see frozen rain falling outside—almost straight down like slow bullets, but there are no spots on the cement of the patio.

A cloud, I swear, has formed against the ceiling and there is a rumbling somewhere, more felt than heard. Either Sharon is awake on the other side of the wall and is sliding open her closet door, or it's mortar fire moving down the valley, or it's thunder from the storm—but before I can check the pavement for holes there are pot and pan noises coming from the kitchen.

She comes in without letting the cloud out the door and offers me a piece of caramel that's been getting harder and readier the whole time she slept. I must take it from her teeth with my teeth. A tiny blue-white spark jumps the centimeter between her wet lips and mine. The snap it makes, a miniscule piece of thunder, loosens from the ceiling a single icy drop which falls to a direct hit on my wet steaming spine, thousands and thousands of feet below.

A. G. Sobin

NIGHT HOWL

1

It might be a hunger chorus, this howl, in the inner zoo whose keeper's deep asleep.

Or strangulating terror.

You fix it outside, though.
Lassoing you by the ear it drags you through no-man's land.

No sooner tugs you into consciousness than it heaves you like a lead line into the waking dream of what is done.

You're at sea again. December '44.
Off Cochin China, swimming armadillos prowl for merchantmen, fishing boats, junks.
The howl is typhoon wind.

You hear water, gargle of sea and rain, within the air rush, feel spray, almost a wave, sting what's exposed of your face, cowed in oilskin.

2

Here holds your eye.

Through the north dormer window you watch a slender elm it seems you own, healthy to the sight but doomed you know in your heart by that blight imported from the nether land of Europe, see it yield to wind's rape, then measure through dark but visible sky the arc of its acquiescence against the anchored mullion of the window, French—Europa again.

3

Now eye leaps after ear:

the oscillating elm trunk turns upside down—or you do—becomes the clinometer's pendulum which you, now manning phones inside the shelter on the flag bridge, watch with bugging eyes—27° starboard, 25° port, 28° starboard. . .

Hull over stacks you go at 30 the chief has told you.

Though scarcely salted, still you'd think he's yarning, but. . .

4

Through the passageway outside they've slung a life line that's burned some skin from your palms.

Lean full weight against the wind, it keeps you vertical.
At first it was fun.

After learning from TBY that the storm wolf's breath has huffed a seaman off the flight deck of the Intrepid, then watching a destroyer, more vulture-like than savior, circle his liquid grave, even old hands grab stanchions, hug and clutch the inboard bulkheads, shy of more than dumps of chamber pots.

Maybe because your flesh weighs leaden you feel you've lost all spirit.

5

Word trickles down the chain:
worst blow the old man's had to weather in thirty years afloat. For the old man or for the 64,000-tons of steel he drives you wouldn't give a rusty piss.

Fright has shriveled your penis, shrunk your testicles to February's prunes. Nobody jokes.

6

Then three DD's, unwitting kamikazes, are swamped, a thousand men at a swallow.

Gray ghost ship riding the gloom yards off the starboard bow—that one you saw mere minutes before it plunged, a half-trip submarine.

Unfathomable.

The rest of you survive to deal more death.

7

Here you must sidestep yourself, your ongoing life, your children, must take a position somewhere outside the terror.

You ought to go down, three thousand men aboard, each at the least acquiescent, deserve to feed the sea.

Little more than sport, blowing the junks, the unarmed fishing boats out of the water like whales.

Oh, that gorgeous, never-to-be-forgotten sunset, blood down blue over the sea of peace, when two parachutes proclaiming "we surrender," mushroomed out of the smoking "Betty."

"Aye, aye, sir, I am watching. . ." through the mounted long glass, screwing a face into focus when pffft . . . a 20 mm shell renders him flesh shreds that still go riding softly down the sky.
 Even after the unmanned chute hits water, collapses, bobs like plankton, the Achilles gunners riddle it, mere fabric, for a countable time of horror, as if it were the body Hector's breath divorced.
 Frenzied to eat raw flesh.

Dead ahead loom
 the firing of their tinder cities, the quaking of their precarious island earth, the cremation in two blinks of a fifth of a million souls.

And after all of them, ungunned, unnerved, unwilling, will cry "enough," our grand old man will steam, flank speed, his bristling wagons to the very shadow of their sacred mountain—dark through dark—will lob those sixteen inchers, 100,000 foot-ton energy at the muzzle, till false dawn shows, bombarding for the glory of the service, Academy '07, their mother soil.

8

You're back in bed. Clock hands, two phosphorescent fish floating the wine-dark sea, tell ten of four.

Sire of the West, Agamemnon, raping Eastern Troy, altering its altars for the worse.

How many pounds of elm falling at such a rate from such a height can rafter 2x6's stand against?

You see your broken self pinned upon a tree trunk upside down.

9

We victors warred
for the white god, righteously.

The vanquished strung themselves a necklace of atrocities with which we choked them black.

10

No peace in sleep.
Finger-like the elm accuses, threatens tormentingly.
The howl crescendos.

Alive you must have plunged to Round One, Circle Seven, Hell.

John Wheatcroft

PICNIC

We saw Edgar Poe on Tuesday, in a balloon.
There was a party on the Wordsworths' lawn, and Sam Saw a tiny face, all eyes, hair and collar, Peering through the fragile guy ropes Of a white balloon, a soft and wavering cloud.
"Which way is eastsoutheast?" —Voice hesitant, American, mustache quivering. I want to go to Paris"
"Ah, that way." Sam pointed to a clump of trees Somewhere toward Cadiz, but was stopped by Keats (Who knew directions — he'd been to Scotland and Safely back, in the rain.) Brown and healthy, Panting from a race with Shelley, Keats moved Sam's inky thumb up the horizon, But stopped — "Have a drink with us." Poe gulped,
"I have to go to Paris", but there was the sun, Too hot for England, and his tight linen stock.
He clambered out, left his Blackwood's on the seat,
And stood shyly on the lawn.

Lamb blinked into the hot blue day, balancing a tray Of glasses. Never an outdoor man, he'd been playing Whist with Dorothy. Tired as she was From copying William's lines, she'd beaten him.
Keats brought Edgar to the crowd. "All here but William—He's weeding out the roses—old fusspot." Poe turned, gasped and nearly spilt his wine And strawberries. Keats guessed and grinned.
"Yes, that's George. Shelley dared him to a race." Another glass, they scattered, and Poe met Mary Lamb.
She watched the sheep, all friends of Blake's, told jokes,

And softly sang in French. "Je suis une jolie bergère." Poe gave back the chorus in a husky tenor, "Et ron ron ron, petit patapon." The party flew to evening.
Poe told Texas stories in outrageous drawls to Byron Who returned the pleasure, giving tales of border abbeys, Bleeding ghosts and monstrous fishes in a voice like winter mist.
Blake caught the wool of the calmest ram And rode him round the roses. Laughing, crumbs in his Mustache, Poe let the balloon go waving, A blossom in its own breeze, as the New York air Sighed out among the green and running mountains.

Deborah Burnham

FRIENDS

for John Barnie

That cold fall day when we were first together walking across an empty field, we saw a wave of sparrows crash against the grass.
That was beautiful, we said;
and final: the field stood dead still again except for our walking.

Yesterday
I was thinking:
now that we must say goodbye, I would like to leave you as slowly as a grey winter day.

But I wouldn't know what to say, sitting there thinking I should say something about parting,
my throat coked,
my mind stuck,
the passing time tearing words from the corners of my mouth

I would like to say:
Today
I saw a wave of sparrows crash against the grass.
But they leapt up again above the houses and trees and for an instant in the upper air caught fire.

F. Richard Thomas

ODYSSEUS AND HIS SIRENS

for Picasso and his painting

1 Noise

"After the Second World War, at the time when he was attracted to Francoise Gilot, Picasso became interested again in the myths of the Greeks. . ."

My ears are bolted but the cochleas multiply in pitched black a labyrinth rings

I am lashed to a ship's flanks my legs running away

My head is sacked with visions of fisharms and flukey legs overrun with honey of generations of bees

I realize
it's no use bolting an other world of jeweled barbarity greens my wrists

I am prize litter of shells my eyes as bone
white as theirs

2 Faces

“The enormous triptych, ‘Odysseus and His Sirens,’ is undergoing rapid deterioration. . . Picasso painted it directly on wood, and the painting has been constantly exposed, in the Museum of Antibes, to the salt air of the Mediterranean. . .”

Fleshtone runoff.

In the Midi where sun and salt adore color a film goddess is cooked in a week.

Even the cloth goes. At the museum a sort of blood appears, a flowing oak. Finally the stone is a god weakly cooked.

Ah, but it's summer! Time for the artist to seize ripeness. . . but they quarrel:
as if this goddess is specially cookable, his anger ringing like ears, he cigarets his woman's cheek She is flesh, she burns, she wonders if short-order cooks are gods, if ripeness wells

nothing but impulse, if agony of care is always cooked like a goose without prayer.

3 Sleep Walking

“He would wander along the beach at night, who knows where he would end up, or how his work might be affected afterwards. . .”

Gristle and scale are paint that multiplies in this cellar joint with its sign out front: The After Burner.

Shades of smoke are spectacles of myself. A thick bass humps a pretty thin liquor.

Cronies are here. Bone and battleshit, McManus trees the Army jeep again and we laugh.

A woman smiles, tells me she's Circe. Fine, I answer, and I'm a purple heart. on Zeus.

If you were sailing, I ask her, past music ravenous as goddesses, would you strap on your guns?

You're always aprowl for a shootout, she says. You can't see your fleshworld yet? how it teems with over and underspirit!

and you piddle with your plan-buildings.

My heart is stung: I want to ask her

What was your name again, but she raises her voice: Look at this place! these carbonated tongues! Look at your knuckles' contraction

(she touches a finger). Let your hands go: blind as a Greek oar! Walk in your sleep.

4 Honeysong

Blue legs kick at a green sea and escape from nothing,

the same bister of sirens, are they real, these voices that rattle eustachian throats

with meadowsong, the poet described them, honeymusic that knows all things

as bees do, suddenly we are attacked, they muster a thousand golden

torsoes chanting in tongues as they needle my sails collapsing,

The fountainous queen flutters me off to combland where she hums and furs with affection but no, I decline, until she weeps and removes her black-gold things, a bare bee-woman splendor before me, I give in, say Yes,

for my crew were petty revulsions, scattered now like clothes,

anxiety dropped like the noise of parties, I am like you, bare and alone.

5 Fish Story

"It is a short distance from the museum at night down to the shore, where with the artist's colors still reverberating inside you might gaze at the starred Mediterranean sky. . ."

Under this water
I am caressed by knuckles of eels, nightfish creak like zodiacals

where I cast new eyes like hooks up to the surface now a sky. To love each one is impossible. . .

necessity:
every axil of finger and fluke that trebles the ears, bluefish who reel as they hit all the joints in Scorpio, bowhead whales tilting Polaris, the rare male seeing with eyes

of a fishgod: Pisces who knows
he can allow no one to get away,

catching each elbow of pike that twangs Lyra, and old Antares winks at each slip,

winks at each human child and fish child who is lost and found to the naked eye.

Edward McCrorie

THE EXO-JONAH TENT

The ribbed, rubbery underside of the whale wrinkles not so much with age as with mapmaker's clarity.
Clutching the abdomen,
I stare up and read out the veins that branch to exactly where I go.

My face brushes the cavernous Fingers, my digging deep, breathing like the crown of remora, skullsuction cup, itch, and scratching, I pull down stretched fold upon canvas of whalebelly: this taffy.

My ride wobbling with resistance, I hang from a baggy balloon over the sea that already holds my slowing beneath the surface.

Helium voice sputtering, the balloon upends.

Harrison Fisher

TWO POEMS

Tit for Tat

Nature made a mistake—or so it seemed—when it drove a force through flesh like a torpedo through mild waters.

There was Anne, dainty blonde, with lullaby-voice and rock-a-bye walk.

And there was Margaret, rawboned redhead, with rusty voice and what-the-hell stride.

These two met in high school.
Vehement gaze shot into cupped gaze, and brimmed. Wool hand grazed silk hand; sizzled, caught, clung.
Sudden summer scorched their skins; nipples budded through blouses.
In the darkened locker room, kisses burrowed; tongues clove like snakes copulating.

The gym teacher blew her nose.
Then she blew her whistle.

A music mightier than a whistle kept swiveling every cell of their flesh into a rhapsody of opposites.
Yin invited yang;
yang explored yin.
Dazzled by their magic, they took secret names: Wella and Wand.

All these implosions made them luminous.
They glided about like a pair of lamps propelled by a gyroscope.

Anne's mother phoned juvenile court, where a new clerk filed her complaint under "Vandalism." When Margaret's mother was notified, she said:
"Shit! It's tit for tat!"

Their fumbling fathers shook hands.

Sweating boys prowled after them.
"Put a hotdog in her locker." "No, a big carrot." "two coke bottles." But when the boys met up with them in class, all their acned faces just said "hi." The boys stopped short of peeking into their windows, as planned, or following them into the woods. What they really expected to find was murder.

Slyly, silently, in corners all over the school, on stairways, in parked cars, other girls adhered in pairs. It was like a courtship of snails.

"My daughter was raised in a Christian home!" Anne's mother yipped. "That other girl's a witch!" Margaret's mother said, "Shit" and went on with her divorce.

Then Anne's mother would not leave the house:

—just when I'm going through my Change of Life!" Anne's father ducked his worrybird face into The Bible and came up with "Oh, Sisters!
We are living in The Last Days!"

But on the whole, this was sensible place: the midwest; a sensible time: 1940. A lot of people were trying hard to overcome their narrowmindedness. One by one, after school, the teachers had talks with Margaret and Anne.
The psychologist gave them inkblot tests.
The blushing clergyman invited them to Youth Night.
The Girl Scout leader told them about Sublimation.
Listening with her lapfull of Love, Anne wept.
But Margaret hauled her off with: "Why in Hell sublimate The Sublime?"

That hurricane walloped all rescue-efforts.
Then it lashed back upon itself, and stopped.
"Kill me!" Anne pleaded. Margaret smuggled her belladonna and razor blades and a pearl-handled pistol. "Lily Liver!" she sneered.
"Kill yourself!" They remained knotted, plus and minus, in that cold equation for a very long season.

Something gave. Margaret bounded out and grabbed a wounded war veteran. He was grateful for her guts.

Anne seemed stunned. Like a flower, she waited for a kind man to transplant her.

He came: His smile was sunshine.

“What a poignant little face!”

His voice was rain.

He transplanted her.

She did not blossom.

His Kindness turned out to be sugar-water.

It did not nourish her; it just preserved the poignancy.

He consulted books. He came up, smiling, with clichés: “But you couldn't be —you're so feminine—” “Just pretend it never happened.”

She did not blame him.

She blamed herself: She had married her fumbling father.

For many years, her Rage was wrapped in Pity.

Then something wand-struck in her flashed like a Loch Ness monster through the sugar-water.

He rushed her to a hospital, where this tale was born.

Messages

Plants talk.

Else a spirit speaks through them.

One Sunday last month in a greenhouse,
 a glamorous plant all but beckoned to me.
 I walked over to this pink flamboyance that rose like a flamingo from a nest of silver-brindled leaves, and under my gaze, it flashed into a crossbred presence— pink cheeks, multiple blue eyes, tutu, feathers—such as Picasso might skewer and label “Ballerina.”

This label, though, said: “Aechmea fasciata, $25.”

—You Beauty, I thought.

I wish I could afford you.

“IN THREE WEEKS,” it whispered.

It was a voice, but not a voice. . .

more of a mist. . .

and something opened like a smile in me to let it in.

“IN THREE WEEKS,” it insisted, and a light bloomed above me.

—wishful thinking, I warned myself.

Light and voice followed me out of the greenhouse

. . . “IN THREE WEEKS!” . . .

encapsulated me like a bubble.

A few days later, Malcolm, my husband fell ill, and for many days I was too busy nursing him to think of talking flowers.

The doorbell rang. It was his colleague, holding in his arms— yes, the aechmea.

Sunday. Three weeks, to the day.

Sitting here now with the aechmea and our secret, I confess this is not the first flower that has spoken to me.
I remember when I was four, a big red zinnia kept chanting. . . chanting? well, wafting a word: "JENNIE."

Then a woman appeared at our door.
Her face was round and rough and rosy, like the zinnia.

"Come meet your Aunt Jennie!" my mother called.

. . . . Afterwards, I announced:
"Mamma, the zinnia told me Aunt Jennie was coming."
That Calvinistic finger wagged at me:
"I don't wanta hear that kinda talk."

Thus that part of me sank.

One hot, humid August afternoon, when my husband and I were strolling along the canal, a huge white mallow whispered to me from its jelly-red center: "THE TREES ARE CLAPPING THEIR HANDS."

Stunned, I kept walking, and the red mouth called:
"THE TREES ARE CLAPPING THEIR HANDS! TELL MALCOLM."

I kept silent. I dared not risk it.
Minutes later, Malcolm halted: "Look!"
Beside the towpath, about three feet above the grass, two small limbs were "clapping."

Still afraid to risk it, I said "Maybe a spider heard us coming—or some bees."

Malcolm replied, "No, it's not like that."

The two limbs went on clapping. Sumac, I think, with leaves like fingers.

"Maybe a snake—" I offered.

Malcolm mused. "No, it's not that kind of movement."

He looked all around: "Not another leaf is stirring."

We stood watching the two little limbs.

It was not the random bouncing, the bobbing, as from a retreating creature, but a deliberate action:

The two limbs were tilted out of their normal horizontal position into the vertical, and were patting together, regularly, like hands.

Exactly like hands.

As we watched, I was all but aware of a smile above the limbs—and a foamy white beard. . . .

I turned and lurched down the towpath. . .

that smile scorching between my shoulder blades.

Stones talk, too.

A schoolgirl, roaming one summer day on Civil War grounds, I came upon a shambled stone chimney.

"PLACE YOUR LEFT HAND ON ME," it entreated.

I did, and my fingers siphoned the message:

"I'M DANIEL THE DRUNKARD. PRAY FOR ME."

I was so nonplussed that I stumbled on without praying.

—Forgive me, Daniel.
I prayed when I got home

Street signs suffer.

Last year the big black letters of the SAGMORE PLACE sign stared so mournfully that I had to detour.

Two weeks later, in the newspaper, the cause confronted me: Young mother murdered.
Baby cries to death in crib. Neighbors did not want to interfere. . . Sagmore Place. . .

My heart cracked. Grief gushed, and still gushes for that baby.

Repeatedly, at Seminary Road, the street sign seemed to sag with sorrow . . . seemed to moan, "FOURTEEN." Week after week, when we passed it, that sag, that ache, that moan: "Fourteen!" A year later, on television, it came:
. . . apartment building under construction at Seminary Road collapsed. . . Fourteen men trapped. . .

SUTTON PLACE shuddered, then signaled and signaled like a desperate deaf mute. A month later, news came that our friend, Paul Sutton, had been killed in a car crash.

Sagmore . . . Seminary . . . Sutton.
Why all these S's? I'm an S.

Are we all ticking together through a kind of compassionate computer?
 Have I already been shunted towards my exit?

Buildings speak too:
 Or a spirit summons from them.

In May of 1964, when I was trying to write a eulogy for the May-born Jack Kennedy, driving past the Department of Justice, I saw—no, felt—someone waving to me from that window to the left of the entrance.
 Malcolm said, “What are you looking at?”
 “The lovely trees,” I lied.

A week later, the same thing happened:
that waving, so frantic, so urgent!
 The impact must have jolted me because my small sons asked: “What did you see, Mom?” “The magnolia trees,” I lied again.

. . . .
 Four years later, Robert Kennedy was assassinated. . . and on television, I saw the Department of Justice. . . saw the pointer placed on the window—the very window where that SOMEONE had waved so frantically—heard the commentator say: “Office of The Attorney General, Robert Kennedy—”

In May 1972, when I was still struggling with that eulogy, The Watergate, which I passed occasionally, kept tugging at my attention.
Ship of Fools, I addressed it, (which is what we Democrats called that sumptuous building where so many rich Republicans lived) —what's with you?

 In my mind's eye, a face appeared, big as a billboard, ruddy, white-whiskered, gray-eyed.

Santa Claus? I mused, and the face evolved into clarity: Walt Whitman.

" . . . I stop somewhere waiting for you. . ." and before I could fetch up the preceding lines of his poem, a voice, like telepathy, intruded:

"DEAN . . . GEMSTONE."

In the ensuing weeks,

The Watergate wore Whitman's face like a figurehead.

Names "—MITCHELL CAULFIELD COLSON—" were beamed carefully, letter by letter, as from a radio.

All summer, prophecies drifted—

"DEAN NIXON RESIGN L. KING WILL BE PRESIDENT—"

like vapor from something brewing.

So insistent the hum from that caldron that I wondered if The Watergate stands on the spot where one hundred years ago the May-born Whitman sat under his favorite apple tree. . . looking out over the Tidal Basin
 . . . dreaming of us Americans yet to be born.
 . . . Wondered, too, if, earlier, that Waver at that window was Whitman, who had worked for a while as a clerk in the Office of the Attorney General. . .

So sure my reception that I wondered if the heat of my concentration on the May-born Kennedy had melted the membrane that let these messages through.

Flowers trees stones streetsigns buildings. . .

And Whitman has returned, as he said he would.
"The Spirit bloweth where It will."

Often in mid-May, a week before my birthday, It nudges me. . . breathes a malaise. . .
It finds that sunken deadpan part of me;
then like a yeast, It proliferates.
Through those soggy summer days and nights, It pummels my wits. . . depresses me like mild flu
. . . swells and swells until It pushes up a cloth. . .

I've never even hinted of it to Malcolm:
There's a coldness about him. . .
I'm too timid to mention it to my sons.
But now that it's surfaced into fashion, I'll slip these fragments to you, Stranger.

"Talk to your plants," say the current faddists.
I say: Keep still. Listen.

Karen Snow

TWO POEMS

An Afternoon On Millinocket Lake

A silence is wrapping around all the lake sounds:
The two fishermen speak of their luck and their words sit easy with the watered distance, the space moving freely about their soft-spoken syllables.
Those birds up there in the pines have a song with a swaying sound, like the motions of a swing, a rhythm coming sharp and clear to the wharf where the people sit.

These rhythms remain fresh, unaffected, in the piles of soft air.
Even the great fish rising to suck up a slug from a floating stick cannot snap the lull from this air.

Crossing The Booms In The Fall

We move down to where the river bottlenecks and begins to slide cold and dark through the throbbing jam of chained pine.
I follow as you cross, the frigid water twisting under your feet like a mink slithering its smooth body.
The long logs creak and roll and nose under slowly.
You walk the dry streak of their knobbed backs unflinching, on these oldtimers heavy with their watered years.

When I hesitate you call back,
"I don't have time to play nursemaid." But I'm thinking of the girl of seven who tried the early ice near here and found that narrow swath the current undermines.
Later when they cut frozen blocks for summer they had to haul her from her sleep with tongs.

Finally you coax me over and I step nervously from log to log beyond the point of strongest flow.
Then, while the afternoon dies around us, we pause on the other bank and I hear the current talking up to us loud and steadily, the sound pervading all the indistinct shapes of twilight.
Paul Corrigan

TELL IT TO THE RIVER

You left a ring on every wall at the level of the eye, on the floor an inch of oily silt to snowshovel away, stirred brown gravy in the cupboards, rippled all the books, ran your nose on all the kleenex, wiped your bottom on the linens, licked the stamps and watermarked the paper.

You left the drunken furniture against the downstream wall, veneer unbuttoned.
The piano, toffee'd into permanent mistune, sold for peanuts to a decorator.
Worse, you shorted on a burner like a spiral harvest moon that could have shone the house down.

Inconsideration. But considering the silting of the arteries, the rising water in the lungs, the stroke's triumphant crest, to be expected.
And we knew just who had dumped on us.
Outside at dusk the leaves were grey with a dust not even rain disturbed, and we saw you leaving, or at least the pair of rats that shod your feet.

Harry Stessel

THE KILL

The gun was left to me by my father who brought it back after the war and stored it in a closet

 old sliver of his life but never taught me how to use it so I learned on my own in the backyard Saturdays.

Come hunting season and I was ready red-jacketed
and boots with warm insides.

 The license cost me and my wife was angry I would leave her for three days go with the car to mountains

 but I promised her meat.
They laughed me off son and daughter at the windows of our house.

Never mind.

I got lost the first day

 spent the night in the woods alone and often I heard deer

 their whining snort and the falling apples in the old choked orchard stomped on my dreams.

The second day by accident I found my car again

 looted
the side window busted open and the farmer down the road said
"out-of-staters"
and clucked.

Never mind.

I slept in the back seat that night and an owl dropped into the elm over my head and barked at its distant mate.

 I was out by dawn

 loaded my weedy face mean with want and without knowing how I found my way back to the old orchard

and saw the buck on its hind legs lean and full of lust for the fruit and crosshatched him and fired.

Quickly
he touched ground bleated and leapt coughed and was into the spruce before I shot again
uselessly.

I followed and could hear the cough of the maimed lung but always out of sight and met the same farmer by a clump of poplar out for his own kill

who laughed and said yes
he'd heard and figgered I'd best give it up they could go on with a bad lung for days before they dropped

“but that’s a long time”

I said

and he shrugged

“never mind
the dogs will eat.”

I kept on after the trail and the sun got caught for a moment in the branch of a dead hemlock

then fell into the ridge.

I hunched

by a rock all night

listened to a porcupine grind

his teeth at me

then clatter off

and followed the old stain in the morning thinking now only

of the rising saltwater in his nostrils

slowly

drowning on land

staggering somewhere in field or furrow

and suddenly

at noon there was no more sign

no trace

and I circled out from the last splotch and back

but there were only the leaves newly let go in a fresh south wind and I knew I was lost again.

They found me three days later I'd stopped walking lost my gun started to see a troop of all the people I knew in the trees hanging and flapping in the wind forever and once a wounded stag lowered his horns and pawed the leaves blood flung in the spittle of his swollen tongue.

My body healed in two weeks.
It was my father's gun that I lost a splinter traveling the blood's path inward to the heart.

Ictalurus

Some four hundred ninety-three restaurants and diners in Illinois rivertowns specialize in Mississippi River channel catfish. At last count, forty-five of these owe their names to the whiskered delicacy; i.e., The Channel King (Quincy), Tony's Catfish N Pizza (Collinsville), Miller's Kat & Keg (Rock Island), and Bullhead Haven (R.R.2,Gulfport).

—Wallace Harmon
Fenceline Omnibus, 1963.

When they built the Burlington Bridge, years ago, they caught one on a crane hook that was so big ev'rybody thought it was a sunk log. Weighed two full ton. They had to cut the cable 'cause it weren't no use tryin' to get the hook back.

They was gonna cut it for steaks at the saw mill, but it was too tough for dog food. Some big timer bought it all up and ground fertilizer outa the meat, carved walkin' sticks and gun stocks from the ribs, and sold the skull to a musim in New York City.

I heard once that there's a fancy house in Springfield with a big window cut from that same old cat's blue tailfin, but I don't 'spect that's true.

Cowtowing

Someone put the first prints here, turned up the first mud, first clay; there was a day when this cover of short grass first tore under clipping feet along a place bare enough to be called a path. It could have been Charlie, or one of the Krimplers, who owned the place before; or maybe it wasn't human—a dog after rabbit, a buck scent-ing the big pond. More than likely it was one of these acrid cows, one of their great great cowmothers or hornless cow-fathers, but whoever it was, if they could turn around, they'd see quite a column behind them: farmers, livestock, rabbits, deer, and dogs, generations going to the pond—with me at the end of the line.

Dragonfly

The heat is buttoned up around the pond, like flannel.
The mud cracks into cobblestones before the eye.

I sit in the spanish needles all day and watch the sun sip green tea from an earthen cup.

High in the sweet-sour air across the field of red clover silent zephyrs of flies kick up, foretelling rain.

Circling the pond, a dragonfly puts the young frogs back in their place.
The pond, with a shudder, is all eyes.

Steve Fay

TWO POEMS

The Circle

Three children gather on a hill To sit, hugging their jackknife knees, In wait for the right wind.

When it comes they board a three-wheeled Coaster with mast and sail For a wobbly wagon ride downhill.

Off, the boards hum like fiddle strings,
The wheels run a raw egg's course On the slope, zigging left then right,

Yoked to loose hubs, Unbelievably, It speeds their fledgling, excited screams Near a quarter mile before the sail

Flattens and the wagon sighs to a halt.
Again, they plod uphill as if knee-deep In marsh. With a pony's pique,

All the stubbornness of a stone,
The wagon balks at each step Until they've made the top.

How swift a downhill flight on the heart's Spinnaker, how slow and bitter the sure return: A round route run in the grip of gravity.

Digging Radishes

Digging compliant earth I uncover under an avalanche of topsoil, last year's clump of radishes still blindly taking root.

Nearby, like handfuls of peas, clusters of maggots, grubs, after a season of winter go on with their underground lives.

Slowly, I turn the wet ground making it ready, and without elegy pull up by the roots what has lived for so long without me, in a dark and a dream I can enter but briefly, with the strength in my trespassing hands.

The radishes, cut-off from their comfort, drown in my hands, in the foreign substance of air, as I carry them home,

wiping their red from my fingers, the juice like a thin gauze staining my jeans. I am told of a man, a native of Bangkok, a gardener by trade, ancient black-belt master of karate, hands swift as shrikes when they forget their rakish trilling and dive from the treetops, pinning their prey to thorns, who in a final test of skill was forced to pluck from the damp chest of a live bull its restless, still beating heart. Like a plow his hand dove into a startled cloister of ribs, turning aside mats of hair, splitting flesh from bone. Then, closing around that rooted heart he jerked it free from a tangle of veins to beat, auricle and ventricle, aorta forked as candelabra, in his hand like living fruit.

His point made, he forsook all further demonstrations to settle back to his life as a gardener in the king's expensive gardens.

I am sure he had learned from his one act, enough of crime and glory, to bear on his tongue the wild taste of winter's bitter radishes.

Richard H. Nester

THE KUTZTOWN HALLOWEEN PARADE

Ghosts dress up in this Dutch county.
Bands from thirty different schools Play songs similar as their uniforms, Majorettes wearing bras That point towards the future Throw batons above the four stories Of the tallest building in town.

Floats lumber by dragging Their skirts, and beauty queens Wave from the backs of pickup trucks.
Even the girls on the sidewalks Have bodies glowing with confetti: Girls from the college, ones from town Who smell ripe as apples.

The sidewalks are jammed beyond The curbs with local populations.
Families awash with children Cheer more children parading past.
Farmers have been hard at work Through long sequestered winters, Their phalluses hardy as sausage And wives like homemade pies.

Tonight the leaves come racing Furled in their dry, veined laughter.
The terrifying thighs of cheerleaders Come stomping by,
Horse chestnuts cracking like teeth Beneath their marching feet.

There will be parties later, And dancing. Lovers will grope below The soaped windows of cars, Holding out as long as possible Against the coming of November.
When they drive home they will pass Under trees strewn with toilet paper, Hanging in their headlights Like Spanish moss.

Robert Gibb

FOUR POEMS

Quantum Mechanics

1

What is the angular momentum of the sun?
Or of the various particles leaving the sun?
Or of the particular particle that having left the sun strikes the asphalt roofing of the barn with no apparent effect? The sun itself is the color of a yellow oak.
Struck by something like the autumn wind it shakes out its own leaves over the ground.

2

If I know where the reddish cat is among the maple leaves can I also know how fast
she moves toward a particular shrew frantic in the hard ground by the barn?
In the shrew's eyes the cat achieves
the speed of light.
Her mass is therefore infinite as she strikes.

After Eadweard Muybridge

1

The woman hops on one foot through half a dozen photographs, her hands held at head level, the shape of her bare breasts changing from frame to frame.

At the end a faint smile may come over her face before she turns and hops through six frames facing away.

2

The bald man in the singlet stands, steps, leaps with both feet, sails above the ground for the space of one photograph shot behind an abandoned barn, lands and again stands still.
He is severe, as if such sailing is no game.

3

The horses walk, canter, gallop or trot, their fine hooves no longer blurred with dust. The horse of the moment extends a polished hoof; the next horse picks it up; it is carried from frame to frame, gleaming.
The speed increased, in one instant the horse folds all four legs to its chest and flies.
It can hang there, folded up like a spider.